

Why?

economic

economical

The word "economic" means "related to money or the economy". For example, we can say "That country has severe economic problems". The word "economical", on the other hand, means "providing good value" or "requiring less money than usual". For example, we can say "The car cost quite a lot to buy, but it's very economical to run".

What's the difference between the words "economic" and "economical"?

The difference ... is that "economic" means "related to money or the economy", whereas "economical" means "providing good value" or "requiring less money than usual"

Give me an example of "economic", please. The government's new economic policy seems to be working

And now give me an example of "economical", please.

He keeps his central heating on all the time because he believes it's more economical

full-time

part-time

terminate

When talking about jobs, people sometimes confuse the adjectives "full-time" and "permanent", and the adjectives "part-time" and "temporary".

The difference is that "full-time" and "part-time" indicate the number of hours a person works each week, whereas "permanent" and "temporary" tell us whether an employee's contract terminates after a certain period or not. If you work 16 hours a week, you have a part-time job; if your contract only lasts for two months, you have a temporary job.
